Resolved Question

What if you are being harrassed for inquiring about supervisors dating subordinates?

I asked my boss what the policy is on supervisors dating subordinates. A supervisor who is currently dating a subordinate found out and is now not speaking to me and not allowing me to help in certain job duties. Since it upset him that I questioned our work policy. He refuses to even say hello at times while on the job and I feel my job may be in jeopardy some day if he becomes our manager someday.

Speak to your HR Department instead of your supervisor. Then advise them that you are getting the cold shoulder from this supervisor ever since asking about the policy. It creates a conflict of interest or possible more favorable treatment to the SO plus if the couple have a falling out and things get nasty it could result in accusations of sexual harassment. That is why companies have these policies. If the couple want to date that badly then one of them should transfer to a different department or another company.

if he isn't speaking to you he can't be harassing you. there is no law saying your boss has to say hi to you.

I have no idea where you live. So i cant really say anything about your rights as a worker.

If its affecting you in any way be it intimidation/harassment here that would be just cause to bring it up with your boss. Obviously this will likely just incite his already dickwad attitude, but at least it should be noted you brought this up if he did happen to try sack you in the future without just cause.
